I Am Glad You Are Here...

The world needs individuals who care for one another. If you are reading this book because you want to provide encouragement and support to those who struggle, I want to say how proud of you I am.

I also want to acknowledge its hard to know how to help someone. We may want to be the one to provide a solution, but often this is out of our control.

Even so, I believe learning about the issue can help us know how to be there for others. When we match our concern and empathy, along with insightful knowledge, it can help us to be prepared to point our families in the right direction.

I Want To Be Clear In The Beginning...

Unless you are a professional who has been trained to know how to step in and offer solutions to those who struggle with addiction, you may not be able to fix the root cause of why someone you care for struggles.

This does not mean, however, that they do not need you. Having support from someone who has insight into the issues surrounding addiction and who knows what professional resources are available—is key. The best thing anyone who is struggling with addiction can do is seek out professional care. We can not take away the good or bad thoughts or feelings of another. But, we all can strive to be supportive loved ones. The fact you are reading this tells me this is who you want to be.

The things which you and I can do, is seek to be the most prepared we can be in order to be individuals who can point our families towards getting the best possible help they can.

My goal is to help you to learn how to understand the complex topic of addiction a little bit better, so you have insight into how to care for a child who may struggle.

If you or someone you care for is in danger of harm, please contact one of the numbers below or turn to the resource section at the back of this book.

SHIFTING THE NARRATIVE
of lost hope

What Is Addiction?

When we say the word “addiction” it can mean many things to different people. On one side, we may make a passing comment about being a coffee addict. Yet, for others—the word “addiction” could bring up life-altering impact for either themselves or someone they care for.

While the brain’s dopamine reward cycle is in effect no matter the substance or behavior—certain addictions have various degrees of consequences to the user or their loved ones, based off of what type it is.

I welcome you to view this 2 minute animation which describes the dopamine reward cycle of the brain which leads to addiction. The Science Of Addiction By “Life Noggin”

Or, for a more scholarly approach, visit Harvard Health’s article on “How Addiction Hijacks The Brain.”

It is important for us to recognize the root meaning of the word “addiction” is to mean “enslaved to.” No matter the substance or behavior—addiction removes power from an individual and shifts it towards that substance or behavior. In essence, someone loses not only a sense of their own control—but also their own identity.

But I dare to believe that our identity is more than any addiction or behavior. As we seek to make the shift away from the incomplete story of addiction and into truth—we have an ability to reclaim our narrative.

The Camino Recovery center¹ names the top 10 addictions of modern society as:

- Coffee
- Tobacco & Nicotine
- Alcohol
- Sex Addiction
- Illegal Or Prescription Drugs
- Gambling
- The Internet & Modern Technology
- Video Games
- Food
- Work¹

Since it is an extensive list, for the purposes of our materials, our team will focus on two areas of addiction:

- Substance use
- Pornography or sex addiction

This does not mean other forms of addiction are not important; only we have chosen to focus on these areas first and hope to build more content in the future.

If you, or someone you care for, are fighting to change your narrative away from addiction and into wholeness—we welcome you to journey with us.

How Many Individuals Struggle?

Substance Abuse

- According to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health (NSDUH), 19.7 million American adults (aged 12 and older) battled a substance use disorder in 2017.¹
- In 2017, 8.5 million American adults suffered from both a mental health disorder and a substance use disorder, or co-occurring disorders.¹
- In 2017, approximately 4% of the American adolescent population age 12 to 17 suffered from a substance use disorder; this equals 992,000 teens or 1 in 25 people in this age group.¹
- About 5.1 million young adults age 18 to 25 battled a substance use disorder in 2017, which equates to 14.8% of this population and about 1 in 7 people.²

Pornography Addiction

- 40 million Americans are regular visitors to porn sites.³
- 1 in 3 porn viewers are women.³
- 25% of all search engine requests are pornographic.³
- The average age of first exposure to Internet porn is 11.⁴

A Word About Changing The Narrative Of Addiction

Before we dive deep into the concept of shifting a story affected by addiction, I want to recognize the fact addiction is a deeply embedded habit and the process of recovery is rarely quick.

In matters related to addiction, the neural make up of a brain has been changed by repeated behaviors or substances. This takes time to modify. Often, recovery has greatest success when paired with professional care. Sharing all of this, however, does not mean there is not hope. I simply want to set healthy expectations in the beginning. With that, I want to share one more thing.

Just because the process may be long, does not mean you are not succeeding. Though we say, “change your narrative” the truth is, it is worth celebrating every moment of changing. This may mean thousands of micro-wins throughout the journey. And my team and I celebrate you in each and every one of those moments. Remember, your identity is not your addiction. Your value is not tied to action. You are worth so much more.

Guilt Versus Shame

I want to take a moment to share something personal. I believe that both guilt and shame can be triggers for negative head space and dark thoughts. Because of this, it is important for me to share how I see guilt and shame, and how we can work through them.

Guilt is the aftermath of an action. It can be healthy—as it lets us know what we did was wrong. Shame, on the other hand, is the cruel rebranding of our identity. It suggests that because of an action—we are somehow a different person. It seeks to stake a claim on who we are.

Guilt can be healthy. Our words, actions, and behaviors have consequences. Guilt helps us to take ownership, learn, and grow. Shame, however, doesn't offer a solution. It just grips our thoughts & emotions in a vice.

How can someone escape the trap of shame? I want to continue this critical conversation in the video below.

Is It Okay To Ask About Addiction?

The fact you are asking, it a good thing. Number one, it shows how much you care for someone. And second, it shows a sense of care in how you approach them.

Depending on your relationship with the person, it is absolutely okay for you to ask. In some cases, it might even be your responsibility. Check your local and state laws under “mandated reporting,” as in many instances if you believe someone is in threat of danger or harm, it is time to act.

And yet, action is often only possible after having a conversation to know what factors could be creating unhealthy choices of the individual you care for.

Check out our video below in which we will discuss:

- When is it time to ask?
- How should I approach someone?
- What should I say and not say?

What To Do If Someone Shares About Addiction

Learning that someone you care for wrestles because of addiction can be incredibly painful. No one wants a friend or loved one to be stuck in unhealthy actions of feel intense internal or external pain.

The reasons, cause and effect behaviors, and thoughts and emotions which come because of abuse range from short-term triggers to extreme distress. As you lean in and learn more, you can enter into conversations with a healthy perspective. In order to do so, we suggest to:

- Point To Help
- Educate Yourself
- Avoid Judgment
- Be Sure To Process

If I Intervene, Will It Damage Our Relationship?

If you believe someone you care for is in danger of addiction, it can be easy to become frozen, unsure what to do or how to help. It may even feel as if intervening would make things worse—and possibly be seen as an act of betrayal.

If it feels like time to act—it probably is. Yet, intervening can have ramifications for your child—and your relationship. This is valid and must be discussed.

I do not know all of the ins and outs of your specific situation. But, you can talk with someone who can give direct guidance for what you are facing, provide you with educational tips which match your situation, and help you feel confident in taking your next step.

This is why I highly recommend you calling a hotline. They can help you gauge the situation and know what your options are to get someone help. As always, if you believe someone is in immediate threat of harm you should call 911 immediately.

Yet, the question remains, “What about backlash?”

This is where it is important for you to get support for yourself. Talk with a friend, community leader, counselor—anyone who can help you walk through the act of helping someone and the aftermath. Will there be a disruption in your relationship? It is possible. Yet, it is important to intervene when someone has plans to harm themselves.

With that being said—your actions prove you are there for the individual and want them to be safe and well. In essence, it means you are also committing to be with them throughout an entire journey as they learn how to walk towards being healthy and whole.

This is a long and difficult process. Maintaining this role in someone's life will take a significant amount of energy, both emotionally and mentally. It is vital to be consistent in someone's life. In short, this means don't start the process and then back out. Don't make a call to intervene in one act, and yet leave someone you care for on their own after a single phone call is made.

This might mean you have to make changes in your relationship, talk about things which are uncomfortable, or introduce new dynamics of support and resources.

Your relationship with someone you care for is unique. This means you need individual support for yourself and the person you care for. Take the steps to get professional insight to help you answer all of the questions you have about how to best be there and find the right type of help for them and yourself.

Helpful and Non-Helpful Parent Reactions

If you think your child might be addicted or be involved in actions or behaviors which are harmful and you want to make sure your reaction is positive as you enter into conversations about it, consider these helpful and non-helpful ways to engage with a family member.

- Helpful: Offer supportive statements and encouragement after listening and seeking to understand.
- Non-Helpful: Offering supportive statements and encouragement instead of listening and seeking to understand.

The factors which leads someone to believe addiction is the only answer to unburden a tremendous sense of inner pain are layered, unique, and have built up over time. They deserve time and space to be unpacked.

- Helpful: Keeping emotions focused on them.
- Non-Helpful: Keeping emotions focused on you.

This is incredibly challenging. You will feel intense emotions yourself as your child explains their own thoughts and feelings. These can range from sadness or fear over their struggle and what they could choose to do, anger that they would consider something with such vast consequences—including what it would do to you, or a mixture of personal feelings you have in light of them sharing.

These feelings are valid and deserve room to be processed in a healthy way. But, that way is not with your child. You will need to turn to your own peer-level or professional support systems in order to help you work through fear, sadness, anger, or any other overwhelming emotion.

- Helpful: Finding the appropriate help in the right time frame.
- Non-Helpful: Making rash decisions out of fear combined with a lack of understanding the process—leading to hovering.

Depending on the unique factors of your situation, it may be hard to find the best first step. However, this is not always the case. It takes a great deal of insight into the complex issue of addiction. It is important for caregivers to be sure to have educated insight into what are the appropriate steps to take—and in what order.

Now that this challenge has entered your family, it will alter the dynamics of your relationships for a season. The goal is to make sure those new dynamics are healthy and promote the well-being of any individual who struggles—instead of pushing them to hide in further silence. To know the difference will take skilled guidance. For that, we recommend connecting with a local professional or hotline counselor. Do whatever it takes to find the best support for you as you and your family make critical decisions for your family's overall health.

What Kind Of Help Exists?

Due to the intensive nature of addiction and the fact it speaks to deep internal struggles, finding help for addiction usually begins by sharing with a skilled professional. This often happens after someone tells a trusted individual life who can help them connect with that skilled professional.

If you are the individual they turn to, be sure to encourage them. Reiterate that anything which is locked inside of their thoughts and feelings deserves a place to be processed in a safe environment which can give them actionable guidance and tools.

Additionally, there are a host of tools which can help you both find steps to taking action. These include:

- Apps Which Offer Mental Health Support
- Communities With Offer Support
- Finding A Professional

Reiterating Why You Offer Support

When a child struggles with addiction, they often are caught in a mental battle of wondering why they are worth your time, effort, or love.

The question in their mind constantly is, “Why someone would want to help me?”

They may also believe help will be temporary until someone sees them as a burden or as a person who is just “too much.”

Because of these factors, It is important for family members offering support to be a continual source of reassurance in why you want to support them—why you want to see them reach a place of wholeness.

This does not mean they dictate our lives or we cater to every whim. That is not what I am talking about. Healthy boundaries are important in every relationship, even ones which have serious complications in the midst.

Yet, I believe one of the best things we can do for someone who is struggling with addiction is to continuously and consistently reiterate the why behind our actions.

So, “Why would anyone want to help someone who is fighting to shift the story of addiction?”

I wholeheartedly believe it is because our love for that person gives us compassion and insight into three things: their future, their pathway, and their value.

Their Future

You have an intrinsic belief that as someone you care for walks a path of wholeness and healing—they have a future.

Their Pathway

You may not have the professional skill to offer the treatment or healing needed, yet you want to be with them on their pathway as they seek it out. You want to offer tangible guidance and see them win in the journey.

Their Value

You have a foundational belief—that the person you care for has value. When you speak with them—it is directly tied into a personal reason why you believe they matter, have importance, and that the outcome of their life is important to you.

The Obstacles In Offering Help

It is fair to talk about the obstacles someone you care for may meet along their journey. It is incredibly tough to watch them face one or all of the following. I acknowledge the fact these moments can create tremendous setback or make it difficult for them, or maybe even you, to want to continue to fight for wholeness. I encourage you to continue to seek support and encouragement for yourself as you journey alongside of them. May you have the strength to continue to fight on.

- Help Seems Hopeless
- A Question Of Worth
- Lack Of Energy
- Disappointing Attempts

Am I A Failure If Someone I Care For Won't Stop An Addiction?

If someone you care for is engaging in continuous addiction, it can be incredibly painful.

You likely have noticed your own sense of worry, fears, and emotions for that person. This is natural, because you love them and want them to be healthy.

But the one thing we don't talk about is the fact that beneath all of this, you may also feel a sense of failure.

If you feel as if you have failed at being a good friend or supportive loved one because the individual you care for has not changed, I want you to know I understand. Your feelings are valid. But, you are not a failure.

In this instance, we need to change the parameters for what true success and failure really are. Let's continue the conversation in the video below:

What To Do When A Loved One Pushes Back

Getting push back when you try to help, is frustrating. As you engage with them, remember it is important to:

1. Go at their pace.
2. Own what is yours.
3. And yet, know this may not be about you.

Recognize push back is often overcome by:

- Being consistent.
- Stating why you are for them.
- Reaffirming them.
- Apologizing for previous disappointments.

Lastly, be honest. It might be good to share how their behavior made you feel.

For a more in-depth discussion about these points, and how to overcome them, check out the video below.

Building A Safety Plan

If you are taking a stand against addiction, you know it often fights back. Taking action each time is a battle which is not easy. Yet, we hope having a pathway to fight back helps you continue to seek wholeness.

Please note: Even with the best of plans, there are times in which a crisis is stronger than our plan. In those moments, seek immediate, professional help. The following ideas on how to fight back against addiction are not intended to take the place of professional help.

The Goal Is Wholeness

Wholeness is about a state of contentment and peace in a life. It doesn't eliminate the past or any previous pain, instead it acknowledges how that pain has affected us—all while striving to form a new narrative.

Wholeness is about freedom—and I believe it is possible for each person to discover for themselves.

Is it easy? Not at all. The pathway can be long and come with obstacles which may make us feel as if we may not make it.

But with the right support and tools—I intrinsically believe we can.

I welcome you, and those you care for, to find it.

Identity Goes Beyond The Struggle

In the core of who I am—I am convinced none of us are defined by our struggles. Our identity goes far beyond what anyone stole from us, did to us, or how they disappointed us.

While it may be true you or someone you love has faced a deep struggle or have been treated in ways they did not deserve, I believe it does not have to be the key identifier of what makes an individual—them.

Wholeness is still available. Though it requires a journey, it's a pathway to be free of pain's influences—as if it was the only thing to define a life. I believe each of us still have life in front of us and it is filled with the ability for hope, the ability to make a difference in other's lives, and the ability to go out there and have positive and meaningful impact.
